I Nation Weeps.

As we write, the cities, towns and hamlets of our broad land are draped in mourning and sadness. They are silent and solemn as they reflect upon the loss that is so great in all the countries, and all the cities.

We are asked to write more, more how.

President Peck, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.

President Lincoln, who was the first to volunteer to write for the dead of the nation, has written an address, which is to be delivered in the House of Commons, and which is to be printed in the northern paper.

The "Honor of our country"—our good, noble, much loved President, Abraham Lincoln, has been lost, and we are asked to extend our sympathy to the friends of the deceased, and to the living.

The words of the President, as we read them, are a tribute to the great and good man, and to the living and the dead.

We are asked to write more, more, more, more how.