NOT AT HOME.

There is one phrase about which we have terrific skirmishes,—the common expression, "Not at home." No conventional or understood meaning is allowed to be assigned to this phrase. "Not at home" means simply according to the words, "I am not in the house, I am absent and abroad;" the second or understood meaning, "I am not visible to friends to-day, and it is no business of yours whether I am in the house or not," not counting. Well, let us take this "not at home" for an example of how far it is possible to tell the exact truth; and remember, if we may not have disguises in one thing, neither may we have them in another; and, if one phrase is not allowed as a mystical kind of domino, neither must be another.

Suppose then, instead of these three words expressing all they do and just what you desire they should express,—out of the house, engaged, indisposed to receive visitors generally, or indisposed to receive that visitor in particular,—at any rate a six-foot bar put up between you and the street-door which not the most pushing can very well force open, you were obliged to tell the exact truth, and tell it too by Mary's lips?

"Oh, sir! missis is having a new wig tried on, and please she can't see you."

"Please, ma'm, missis is at home; but she says as how you are so unpleasant to her she can't abear you, and you do so run on about yourself, and you have such a bonnet as give her the jaundice to look at."

"Yes, sir: master and missis is both at home; but master's in the dining-room a-blowing up missis awful, and missis's eyes they are as red as red, and she'd rather you'd not see her look such a fright."

"Yes, sir: they're all at home. But there's young Mr. Sparrowhawk in the drawing-room along with Miss Em'ly—he is; and they are looking out for him to say something like a gentleman to-day, for they've all slinked down-stairs, and left them alone."

These are only a few of the possible features of a perfectly unveiled and honest truth; and pretty possibilities they are,—lovely features, certainly, to have handed round to all the gossips in your set! Duns; poor relations whom you love and value, and of whose sensitive pride you are tenderly careful, but whose gowns are unmistakably shabby, and your visitors a purse-proud couple who will weigh them according to the money-worth of their appearance; washing-day, and everything pervaded by a smell of soap and steam and soda; your teeth at the dentist's, no one suspecting that they are "dentist's triumphs" at all; the off day of the hair-dyeing, when you are a mixture of purple and gray; quarterly bills, and papa in a state of effervescence; a case of mild scarlet-fever in the nursery, and you anxious to conceal the fact, yet not subject any one to danger,—we can imagine hundreds of instances in which no one would like to tell the naked truth, and where the naked truth would be quite unnecessary, and indeed do more harm than good. Yet our friends and combatants used to gravely assert that "not at home" was an untruth utterly inadmissible, and that "engaged" was the nearest approach to a subterfuge possible to be allowed.

Engaged! We wonder how many people would take that for an answer? Some of course would,—the well-bred and the formal and the timid and the reluctant: they would all murmur the polite phrase proper for the occasion, and drop their cards into the servant's hand with the stereotyped unmeaning smile, and the stereotyped unmeaning regret; but there are dozens of our robuster acquaintance who would constitute themselves exceptions on the spot, saying complacently—

"Oh, I am sure she will see me!"
 "Sarah, just go and tell Mrs. Brown that it's only me, Mrs. Smith; and I'm sure she'll see me, if only for half a minute."

"Engaged, is he? Then go and say to him—will you?—that I shall not keep him long. My business is very pressing, and indeed I must see him: but I shall not detain him long."

His business is only a boring hour of personal gossip, perfectly uninteresting, and of no good to heaven or humanity.

A STARTLING FACT.—The little town of Monroe, Michigan, contains eighty-two marriageable girls and only three unmarried men. We advise all those poor wights who are in danger of shrivelling into old bachelorhood to take the first train for Monroe. By all means go to Monroe and rescue those eighty-two forlorn females.

—Oil may, as they say, calm the ocean, but it is creating a tremendous agitation on land.
