

RECEPTION OF SENATOR YATES.

Yesterday at 11 o'clock Senator Yates was accorded a warm reception at Bryan Hall. A large crowd was gathered to greet him, and he was received with hearty applause.

Judge Bradwell then introduced Senator Yates as follows:

REMARKS OF JUDGE BRADWELL.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: We have the pleasure of having present this morning, Ex-Gov. Yates, our present Senator.

He is the man under whose direction, as Governor of this State, our army was organized. He had the pleasure of having many of those banners, which now decorate this hall, prepared. It was under them, shining and glossy, that our men went forth to battle. It was under them, and under his direction, that our boys swore, by their Creator, that the rebellion should be put down, at any and all hazards. How well they have kept that pledge to the governor of the State of Illinois, these old and tattered flags testify.

He it is, you will recollect, that was down on traitors everywhere. He is the man, who, you will remember, when some of our Union men in the Southern portion of this State undertook to have a party and to raise the stars and stripes, and when some traitors undertook to tear them down, he it was who ordered them to shoot them down on the spot as they would a dog, and he would pardon them (applause,) for the Union and the Government, then, was not so popular as it is to day.

Senator Yates has lived to see the Union preserved, and these troops return, having done their whole duty, and the State of Illinois, under his direction, has done its duty as no other State in the Union. (Cheers.)

I now have the pleasure of introducing to you Senator Yates.

Senator Yates then came forward amid great applause and responded in a most eloquent speech, replete with patriotic sentiments and glowing with beautiful thoughts;—

SENATOR YATES' RESPONSE.

FELLOW CITIZENS:—I am here with the expectation of meeting a distinguished military gentleman. This is no occasion of my own. I have asked no receptions, and sought no receptions at the hands of the people of the State of Illinois. But I am willing, so far as I am able, in an humble way, to contribute to the success of this great enterprise, this Sanitary Fair. Since I have come here I have been gratified beyond expectation. I confess to great admiration and wonderment at the scenes of enchantment which the patriotic men and women of Chicago, and of other States, actuated by a love for our soldiers and by a sublime devotion to the country, have prepared for our entertainment, transcending the creations of the fairies of old. I have seen in these various departments every implement of usefulness, every creation of beauty which the fertile genius and the refined taste of women and men could invent. I have seen in these magnificent edifices which have been raised for this occasion a wonderful adaptation to the object for which they were established; the agricultural, the mechanical and the commercial departments all complete; flowers and flags, hills and dales, streams and fountains, the singing of birds and the charm of music, everywhere, to entrance our delighted ears and our wildest admiration. But I am here to day at the request of Judge Bradwell; and let his efforts speak for themselves, in this magnificent hall, with these trophies gathered from every portion of our country, proclaiming his labors and proclaiming also the contributions which our countrymen are willing to make in behalf of the soldiers. I confess to you, most humbly, that this department of the Sanitary Fair is the more gratifying to me. If there is anything in this world that I admire and that I delight in, that I loved from boyhood's life to the present moment, it is the ever glorious flag of my country; that flag which for eighty-five years has waved to the God of storms, the lightnings and the gale; the flag under which Washington, and Jefferson, and Franklin, and Jackson rallied.

But to-day that flag has a consecrated meaning; to-day it has a double significance; for every fold and every shred, and every bullet-pierced fold, is eloquent of high and noble prowess for the Union and for Liberty. [Cheers] Respected as it has been heretofore, it will hereafter be held in respect and revered by the oppressed of every nation, and feared by tyrants everywhere, as the emblem of nationality, of our Union, of the undivided and indivisible United States of America.

Fellow citizens, the occasion is this: It is not an unmeaning display. It is not the mere evidence of the boundless wealth of the country—of its prosperity. It is not that. It is not to show that Chicago, the mighty city of the Northwest, can do what she attempts to do, for Chicago never fails! [Applause.] It is the evidence that while our brave armies go forth to battle, bearing aloft our unconquered banner; while the soldier burnishes his musket for the storm of battle, or lingers upon his bed of pain in the hospital, he shall know that there are millions of hearts and hands that are busy in sending to him ministering angels of mercy, and to make him to know that there are hearts to feel for him in his distant field of service. [Applause.] And I thank God that while these tattered and battle-scarred banners, which I have been collecting from our regiments of artillery, infantry and cavalry—and I know them, one by one, as they have come in and been arranged in their appropriate places—I am proud that while they have been borne at the head of our brave volunteers, and the shot and shell and thunder of the battle, that also, side by side with them, have been borne the glorious flags of the Christians Commission and the Sanitary Commissions.

I know that short speeches are desired upon this occasion, and I only have this to add in conclusion, that all of this were an unmeaning ceremony were it not for the fact that by this war we have accomplished everything. We have established the fact that a Republican government can maintain itself. We have established the fact that a government of the People can go into the most gigantic war that ever afflicted any people, and can come out of it stronger than before. And now, fellow citizens, if we can establish that other glorious fact of this war, the fact that traitors can be punished, that they can meet the doom which belongs to them, then we have a perpetual guarantee for the existence of this Republic. If I had it in my power, while I would be magnanimous, while a great nation should be magnanimous to its conquered foes, while I would pardon the masses who have been reduced by misrepresentation into the support of treason, and would extend pardon and forgiveness to all the masses of our Southern brethren and say to them, come back into the Union, justice should go with mercy; (applause) justice with judgment. And I would say that every leading traitor in the South who had raised his parricidal arm to strike down the temple of American liberty, should meet with appropriate punishment. (Applause.) For those inhuman monsters that have stood by and seen our prisoners starved by thousands, day after day, I know no punishment which I would not inflict upon them. (Cries of Amen, and applause.) I would say to every man who had held office in the Southern Confederacy as a general or a legislator, or in any other capacity, that he should never again cast a vote or hold an office as an American citizen. (Enthusiastic applause.) That would be my doctrine. While I would extend to them the most cordial sympathy, I would have it engraved in their constitutions, in plain writing, that there should be no more secession and no more division in the United States of America. (Applause.) And above all it should be proclaimed that the source of this discord should never more exist, and that not a solitary slave should ever again clank his chains upon one inch of the soil of America.

And fellow citizens, I would go further, and I speak for myself to day; I speak not for the politicians, who stand back, or for others,—I would go further, while I am for Universal Liberty I am also for Universal Suffrage. (Hearty cheers and applause.)

After the conclusion of the speech, a very pleasing episode occurred. Mr. Maple handed to the Senator a beautiful cane, and desired him to present it to Judge Bradwell. Of this part of the performance the Judge was in entire ignorance. He was little less than thunder-struck when Senator Yates, turning to him, said:

"Judge Bradwell—I am requested by many of your friends, for them and in their behalf, to present you with this beautiful testimonial of their high esteem for you as a citizen and a friend, and their appreciation of your most praise-worthy efforts in connection with this department of the Great Fair."

Judge Bradwell replied: "Senator Yates, Ladies and Gentlemen—This is a genuine surprise. I had thought that on any occasion I should have something to say; but I confess myself vanquished by your unexpected kindness, and can only say that I thank you most sincerely for this token of your kind regard."

The cane is made from wood from Mt. Vernon. The top is fashioned as a miniature Columbiad, and, on the whole, is as unique as tasteful. This is a testimonial most deserved by the Judge. The universal verdict is, "served him right."
