CURIOS FACTS FROM SAVAGE LADY

Margery was born and brought up in a happy dream. She was a fair-haired, golden-eyed child, who, as a matter of fact, was rather plump and rather silent. She was not a success in school, but she was not a success in life, either. She was more interested in books and in the world of butterflies and flowers, than in the world of men and women.

Margery was a strange and wonderful child. She was a child of the great American West, where the prairies stretched out for miles and miles, and the sky was blue and the sun was hot. She was a child of the great American West, where the air was free and the people were free.
