IT is a common charge against the novels and dramas of our contemporaries that they are, up to a degree, too artificial; creating impossible characters, introducing impossible situations, etc. There is a great deal of truth in some that never have their counterpart in time or place. In this respect, our daily record of incident and crime, the crime may seem hollow, but the column of the newspaper proves the truth of Byron's saying of women.